

Module-6

Presentation and Negotiation skills: Presentation: What is a presentation, Elements of presentation, Designing & Delivering Business Presentations, Advanced Visual Support for managers.

Negotiation skills: Definition of negotiation, Nature and need for negotiation, Factors affecting negotiation, Stages of negotiation process, Negotiation strategies.

Etiquette Advantage in Managerial Communication: Meaning, types and advantages of Etiquette.

Presentation

What is a presentation?

A presentation is a means of communication that can be adapted to various speaking situations, such as talking to a group, addressing a meeting or briefing a team.

An activity in which someone shows, describes, or explains something to a group of people. The charts and graphs helped me understand the presentation. She will take your questions after she has made her presentation. The senior accountant gave a presentation at the meeting.

Elements of a Successful Presentation

1. Engaging icebreakers

Start on an engaging foot and break the ice with your audience through a brief activity. You could ask a fun icebreaker question such as, “What movie most closely resembles your life?” or, “What vegetable would you be?” and encourage conversation. Or, you could conduct a short quiz or poll related to your presentation topic.

Another way to break the ice with your audience is by playing a short and simple icebreaker game like, “Have you ever?” or “Two truths and a lie,” playing with either your entire audience or smaller groups seated together.

2. Visual storytelling

Humans are social creatures, and our brains respond to stories more than facts alone. Mankind has used storytelling to pass its wisdom and lessons to future generations since the days of painting cave walls. At the same time, we also respond to visual information—the largest parts of our brains are dedicated to visual stimuli, after all.

Combine the two concepts, and the resulting visual storytelling is one of the most effective ways to attract an engaged audience that remembers your message long after your presentation ends. Visual storytelling elements like photos, video and infographics more effectively tell your story leaps and bounds than the spoken word and text alone.

3. Eye-catching images

Just as visual storytelling makes for an engaging and memorable presentation, eye-catching images are ideal for attracting, retaining and refocusing audience attention. Look for images with bright and bold colors, interesting angles or exciting subjects, and your audience members' eyes will stay glued to the screen.

4. Data visualizations

By including statistics, facts and other data in the elements of a good presentation, you provide your audience with the evidence it needs to trust your message— if you can give the data meaning. Designing slides with too much text and too many numbers is a good way to put your audience to sleep.

Data visualizations, however, tell the data's story. Present your data through elements like bar graphs, pie charts or pictograms. Beautiful.ai users can include all sorts of engaging infographics in their presentations with ease. Just input the data and watch as artificial intelligence designs the perfect infographic to illustrate it.

5. Animations

Eyes are attracted to movement. It's why video is increasingly surpassing text in popularity for receiving information. You can add movement and draw your audience's eyes back to your presentation by animating your slides. One of the simplest animations to add are the transitions between slides, but Beautiful.ai users can even animate their infographics and add motion to various elements of individual slides.

6. Simplicity

If you present slides that are overcrowded or cluttered, nobody is going to want to look at them for very long. Not only that, but your audience probably can't digest that much information from a single view. Keep your slides simple and tidy. It's better to add more slides than to add too many elements to each.

Beautiful.ai users need not fear poorly designed slides. Every time new content is added, artificial intelligence adjusts the layout of the slide based on principles of great design recommended by the pros.

8. Music

Music isn't one of the more common elements of presentations, but it should be. After all, listening to music engages practically every neural subsystem. According to Johns Hopkins research, however, music embedded throughout a visual presentation "can sustain attention, while slipping the content into long-term memory."

Dr. Ronald Berk, now an author and keynote speaker, says even background music, "can increase attention levels, improve retention and memory, extend focused learning time and expand thinking skills."

9. Videos

Video is another effective element of presentations that attracts your audience's attention and interest. Video elements can capture expert feedback if they can't appear in person, illustrate activities that a still photo just can't capture, demonstrate how products are used and, of course, add eye-catching movement to a slide deck.

10. Audience immersion

What better way to capture an audience's attention than by making them a part of the show? Audience interaction is an extremely effective element of a good presentation.

Invite audience members to get involved with your presentation, whether by inviting a single viewer to participate or by designating smaller groups or teams to interact together. Audience immersion can be achieved through activities like games, challenges, demonstrations or even short skits.

11. Props

One classic element of a good presentation is the addition of props. Whether you pull out humorous objects that help to illustrate your topic, or design visual aids in addition to your slide deck, the use of props almost always adds some extra pizzazz to an otherwise ordinary presentation.

12. Orderly and cohesive designs

A powerful presentation will include slides designed with order and unity. Every slide in the deck should look like it belongs with all of the others. At the same time, you can select color palettes and typography that support the mood, tone or topic of your presentation.

Beautiful.ai users easily can ensure their slide decks feature orderly and cohesive designs by customizing a theme or brand style guide for every presentation so that elements like certain fonts, colors, margins and footers automatically are added to every slide. Just add your favorite design elements on a master slide.

13. Clear goals

What do you want your presentation to accomplish? If audiences are receiving your intended message, what does your presentation accomplish?

Be sure to define goals for your presentation, and only add content to your slide deck that supports those goals. Do you simply want to inform? Or do you want to persuade your audience to share a viewpoint or change a behavior? Determining your objective is a key element of a powerful and effective presentation.

14. Calls to Action

Don't take any chances that your audience will misinterpret your message or fail to understand the objective of your presentation. Cut straight to the core of your message with a clear call to action.

To ensure your call-to-action is effective, be sure to start with a strong commanding verb, use words that insight emotion or enthusiasm and provide your audience with a reason they should take the suggested action.

15. Strong closing slides

All of your hard work designing a powerful slide deck might be for naught if your presentation doesn't feature a memorable ending. One of the most effective ways to achieve a strong conclusion is by including an end-of-presentation slide. This slide could include a summary, a call-to-action, a joke or an interesting quotation that will leave audiences pondering long after you've finished presenting.

16. Hooks and earworms

Interjecting hooks in between key points of a presentation is an effective way to refocus an audience's attention. Meanwhile, ending a presentation with an earworm can keep people thinking about your topic for hours or days. While they serve different purposes, hooks and earworms are very similar and each can be accomplished by examples such as a funny story, a joke, an insightful quotation, a fun fact or a rhetorical question.

Designing & Delivering Business Presentations

Planning your Presentation

A good presentation requires careful planning. In general, you will need to follow these steps to plan a successful presentation:

-
1. Brainstorm and outline: What's your topic? What do you know about the topic? What do you want your audience to know?
 2. Research: Use research to support your argument, find examples and statistics, or to learn more about your topic.
 3. Write an outline.
 4. Write a draft.
 5. Plan any visual aids such as PowerPoint or any activities you want your audience to participate in
 6. Practice, practice, practice! Make sure your presentation is not too long, and edit it down as needed.

Organizing your Presentation

A good presentation should be well organized, with a beginning, middle and end.

Beginning:

The beginning of a presentation is very important! This is when you have an opportunity to grab the audience's attention, and set the tone for your presentation.

-
- Use an attention grabber. Some attention grabbing techniques include: asking a thought-provoking question, showing the audience an intriguing picture, telling a story or use a real life example related to your topic, sharing a shocking statistic related to your topic, sharing a powerful quote, playing a short video
 - Introduce yourself and the topic you will be discussing
 - Outline what you will be talking about.

Body:

- Discuss your main points in a logical order
- It should be clear to your audience when you are moving from one point to another
- Use examples to support your points

Conclusion:

- Summarize the main points
- Avoid providing new information at this point, but you can state any additional questions that you think your research has led you too
- Use language that lets your audience know that your presentation is coming to an end
- Avoid ending with "that's it!" or apologizing for your presentation
- Thank the audience for listening and invite questions

Signal Words and Transition Phrases

Using transition and signal phrases throughout your presentation will help keep it organized and ensure your thoughts are communicated clearly. Try using some of the phrases below to introduce ideas and structure your presentation.

Introducing your presentation:

- The topic/question I will be discussing today is...
- This presentation will investigate/examine...

Providing an outline:

- I want to start by..., then I will...
- This presentation is divided into [x number] of parts. First I will... then I will..., finally I will conclude by...
- There are [x number] of points I will discuss: A, B, C and D
- Let's begin by looking at... before examining...

Introducing your main point:

- A significant issue is...
- A major concern is...
- The central problem is...

Rephrasing your main point:

- In other words...
- Another way to think about the problem is...

Moving to another point:

- Now let's consider...
- I'd like to move on to examine...
- Now, turning to the issue of...

Introducing an example:

- A case in point is...
- Take the case of...
- This is illustrated/demonstrated by...
- An example of this is...

Introducing images or explaining visuals:

- This image/diagram illustrates...
- As you can see here...

Introducing and integrating videos:

- We will now watch a short video that illustrates...
- In the video we've just watched, it is important to note that...
- As the video demonstrates...

Conclusions:

- To sum up...
- In conclusion...
- In summary...
- To summarize...
- To conclude...
- Therefore...

Inviting and Answering Questions:

- I am happy to take questions now.
- That's a very interesting question. In my opinion,

- Thanks for your question. What my research shows is that...
- That's a relevant question, but it is out of the scope of my research.
- I'm afraid I cannot answer that question, but that's an interesting topic.

Delivering the Presentation

How you say things may often appear to be more important than what you say. Have you listened to charismatic speakers who gain and maintain the attention of the audience? Have you also encountered speakers who quickly put an audience to sleep? Experienced presenters learn to communicate effectively by using voice, gestures, and visual aids while trying to establishing a comfortable environment for the audience.

Voice

Using your voice effectively can have a great impact on your delivery. The best speaking voice is conversational, natural, and enthusiastic. Use the following guidelines to develop an effective speaking voice:

- Alter the pitch (high and low) of your voice to prevent yourself from sounding monotone. Don't alter the pitch too much, however, because this may make you sound unnatural.
- Speak loudly enough to be heard by everyone in the room, but vary the volume of your voice to maintain interest and emphasize key points.
- Stress certain words as another way to add emphasis. Typically when you stress a word, the pitch and the volume increase.
- Alter the rate at which you speak to maintain interest and add emphasis. Speak faster to show excitement and/or build suspense. Speak slower to show the importance of an idea. Pause after important ideas to allow the audience time to grasp them.

Gestures

Speakers often communicate with their audience either intentionally or unintentionally using gestures and other physical behaviors. Use the guidelines below to help use gestures to your benefit:

- Maintain eye contact with members of the audience to keep their attention level high. Eye contact signals that you care about the audience and you are attuned to their needs. Also use eye contact to detect confusion or boredom so that you can then modify your approach.
- Use positive facial expressions such as smiles, expressive eyes, and looks of empathy and encouragement to communicate feelings and emotions.
- Stand naturally with your feet spread slightly apart and arms relaxed at your sides.
- Minimize gestures like pacing back and forth, rocking back and forth, playing with coins in your pocket, wringing your hands, and other types of fidgeting. These gestures not only signal that you are nervous, but they are distracting to the listener as well.
- Use quick and energetic movements of your hands and arms to add expression to your talk. Maintain the attention of the audience by making your movements unpredictable

Visual Aids Support in Presentation

Visual aids can help you emphasize main ideas, illustrate a concept, or stimulate the interest of your listeners. Examples of visual aids include posters, overheads, flip charts, photographs, computer-generated slides, and three-dimensional effects.

- Use visual aids to emphasize important points and add interest to your presentation — don't put every word of your entire presentation on them.
- Select the appropriate visual aid for the environment. It may be possible to pass visuals around to a small audience but in large groups you'll need to project them.
- Give the visuals a consistent appearance including color and spacing. Start the text at the same place on each visual.
- Try to observe the seven by seven rule: on an overhead slide have no more than seven lines and seven words per line. Similar rules would also pertain to flip charts, PowerPoint and other computer generated slides, and posters.

- Use a simple typeface or font. Don't use more than two different typefaces, if possible.
- Make sure the text is large enough for people in the back of the room to read. Letters on a flipchart should be at least 3 inches in height. For a projected overhead or slide, fonts between 20 and 48 points are customary.
- Don't show visuals that conflict with what you're saying — this includes displaying them once you've moved beyond their content.
- Don't read the text that's on the visual, but do paraphrase and add to it.

Good Visual Aids During a Business Presentation

Good visuals in a business presentation can range from complex videos to a simple poster. For those presenters who are not skilled in the video arts, there are several ways to present information with visuals that will help your audience remember key points long after your presentation has ended. Three effective methods include PowerPoint presentations, flip charts and posters.

PowerPoint Presentations

PowerPoint offers hundreds of font, audio and image options for its users. The first thing presenters should understand is that just because there are 350 font options does not mean you should use them. Always use either light font over a dark background or dark font over a light background. Avoid red font and green backgrounds or fonts and backgrounds that are close on the color wheel as they will be difficult to read. Follow the rule of 8. The rule of 8 states that you should be able to read your presentation while standing 8 feet away from the standard computer screen. If the font is too small to read from this distance, it will be too small to read in your presentation. Include a maximum of five points per page.

Effective Flip Charts

Flip Charts are not only inexpensive but they can also be used for ideas and brainstorming within the context of the meeting. Use dark markers to write on a flip chart and make sure you have plenty of paper on the flip chart pad. Some flip charts now have adhesive on the back of each page so the presenter when finished, can stick the page to a corresponding wall that the audience can see. This feature prevents having to flip back and forth from page to page wasting valuable time and allows for writing a free flow of ideas with ease.

Effective Posters

Posters are prepared much in advance of a presentation. The simplest posters can be made from poster board with graphics and text added with glue or tape. More advanced posters can be made using PowerPoint and then printed and laminated for a more professional look. Change the size of your PowerPoint slide to a good poster size, such as 2-by-3 feet, and decrease the view percentage on your computer screen to around 25 percent, or the smallest view that still allows you to see each element clearly. PowerPoint hints also apply to poster design. Avoid designing posters that are too busy or have too much text. A poster should have an eye-catching visual that tells the story without viewers having to read paragraphs of accompanying text.

Considerations

Simplicity is key in conveying information visually. The more complex the visual, the more likely you are to lose the message you are trying to convey. Visuals can help your audience retain information up to six times longer. Beware, however, of staying on one visual for too long. According to The Eggleston Group, studies show that audience members become bored with a visual after 7 to 10 seconds. Always rehearse with your visuals. Don't forget to inspect the room where you will be presenting to make sure the elements required for your presentation, such as projectors, screens and outlets, are available.

Extra Supporting material Regarding Presentation.

Role/ Importance of Business Presentation

Business presentations are often utilized by the organizations and companies as a way to sell an idea or product for motivating the audience or training purposes. The presenter needs to prepare and rehearse before a business presentation for becoming confident. There are many factors that determine the effectiveness of a business presentation. Some of them are stated below:

1. Connecting

A memorable bonding experience between the audience and the presenter is created by the interactive business presentations. This type of presentations involves the audience and helps in the driving home the overall message.

2. Informative

Every listener wants to know about the main nuggets of information such as learning tricks for improving the performance or how to overcome problems. A great presentation leaves the audience with a good piece of information that should be eye-opening and enlightening.

3. Inspiring

It is very important that a business presentation should be able to capture the attention of the audience. It should consist of the elements of a story, complete with anecdotes, lessons, conflicts, and resolutions. In addition to this, the presentation also required targeting on the important points from the start for capturing the attention of the audience.

4. Appealing

The impact of a business presentation on the audience is also affected by using visual or physical props. Some of the factors that mostly appeal the audience are screen projectors, handouts, slides and body language of the presenter. However, the exact impact of the props greatly depends on their relevance to the presented information.

Types of Business Presentations

There are basically four types of business presentations stated below:

1. Group Presentations

The findings of a team are communicated by the group presentations. Generally, these types of presentations remain informational in structure and seek to convince the people for accepting new programs and strategies.

2. Presentation Aids

Nowadays, the computer programs such as Flash and PowerPoint are used by the presenters for enhancing their presentation. Even the simple blackboard can augment the business presentations by capturing the feedback and questions of the audience.

3. Persuasive Presentations

The main motive of a persuasive presentation is to convenience the audience for supporting certain views. Generally, it outlines an organization goal or problem and then follows it by the statements for detailing the present state of affairs.

4. Informative Presentations

This type of presentation consists of educating the audience. It consists of status reports or summaries and starts with an overall goal that follows the action and specific plans.

In simple words, a business presentation plays a vital role in the advancement of any organization.

TEAM PRESENTATION

Making a presentation can feel like a lonely task as you stand up and face your audience. Whether you sink or swim all depends on your performance – and of course that depends on how well prepared you are. There are times when you may have to give a presentation as part of a team e.g. pitching for a contract. This can be a daunting prospect too as you have to rely on other people and you may feel anxious about loss of control.

As a presentation team you need to work together closely to achieve your desired outcome. The first step is to decide who should be in the team, who should lead and what each person should be responsible for.

If possible, plan and structure your content so that the audience benefits from contrast and variety. For example, if one speaker presents a lot of facts and figures; the next could follow with some colourful images. Similarly, you can alternate the voices or characters by perhaps having a serious personality followed by a more light-hearted one. Again this helps keep your audience engaged.

Rehearsals are always important and particularly so for team presentations as there is more chance things could fall apart. It's about working together, deciding on the best 'batting order', making improvements to content etc. It is especially important to rehearse handovers from one presenter to another. These are the things that demonstrate to the audience that you are well organised, confident and truly a team – not just a group of individuals.

Here is an example of a smooth handover:

Jack: "I'll now hand you over to Jill who will explain the steps involved in the design process."

Jill: "Thanks Jack. (Then to the audience) I'd like to spend the next 10 minutes or so talking you through how we will....."

Ten tips for being an effective team on the day

1. Arrive early and allow plenty of time for set up.
2. Agree who will sit where and what works best for the available space.
3. Be supportive and encouraging towards colleagues who are particularly nervous about presenting.
4. Have a strong leader to kick off the presentation effectively and to move things along.
5. When they are not presenting, the rest of the team should support their colleague by paying attention and looking involved in what is being said.
6. Show some appropriate reactions e.g. nodding or smiling at certain points – even if you've heard the presentation numerous times already!
7. Remember the impression you create with the audience counts for a great deal.
8. Glance at the audience now and again to show you are in touch with them. You might pick up on some reactions or vibes too.
9. Never shuffle through your own notes while your colleague is talking.
10. Demonstrate a united front and back each other up throughout and especially at question time.

In conclusion, giving a team presentation can be a very rewarding experience. It all depends on teamwork and making sure you have all your ducks in a row.

Online Presentation

An online presentation is a prepared speech or talk in which a person or group provides information, pitches a new idea, or introduces a new product or service through a video call. Online presentations are given to an audience, usually in a business setting.

Start with Momentum

Virtual presentations are like taking a flight on an airplane. The beginning and ending are super important, but the middle's kind of a blur.

That's why, if you're going to prioritize any part of your presentation, you are better off spending the majority of your energy on the first and last minutes. Let's focus on the first moments.

The beginning of your presentation is critical because it sets the tone—a good first impression makes you feel confident and your audience relaxed. This forward momentum will carry onto the middle part of your presentation where you'll be presenting the bulk of your data/statistics/information—so if you don't nail your first impression, you won't gain that forward momentum you need for the rest of your presentation.

And believe me, people judge you almost instantly! Here's what the science has to say about first impressions

So when you're delivering a presentation online, you should try to make your beginning as error-free and smooth as possible. This includes being prepared and removing potential roadblocks:

Fix computer errors: ALWAYS double- or triple-check your equipment before giving a virtual presentation. Make sure your microphone, webcam, and internet is working. If you have to fumble around with technical details during the video call, your audience may have the impression that you are unreliable.

Eliminate distractions: Silence your phone, turn off desktop notifications, get rid of loud fan noises, and make sure your room is kid/dog free. Keep in mind that your audience will likely be listening through their headphones, so even the tiniest of noises might be heard.

Dress appropriately: Here's an easy one that some people actually neglect. Have you ever been in a situation where you feel like you should have worn something a little nicer? If you are giving a business presentation, dress in business appropriate attire (yes, even the pants, too!). It's best to match your audience—and if in doubt, err on the side of professional! It's also important to wear a color to stand out from your background, but not a color that's too distracting.

Be happy: Like it or not, we can't hide our emotions. Research shows that people can hear your mood from your voice. So if you're not in a good mood, try boosting it! Watch some funny YouTube videos or give yourself a small pep talk. Sounding confident and happy is the key to success, so make sure you are in the right mood before you go live.

Open With IISSAAQQ

What does this really bad spelling of Isaac stand for? IISSAAQQ stands for the best ways to start an online presentation:

Icebreaker: One of the best ways to open up your audience is to give a virtual icebreaker. I always keep an icebreaker on hand that can be done over the computer before starting any online presentation—it's one of the best ways to connect with your audience!

Illustration: You can say to the audience “Remember when...” and provide a picture, or paint a scene by telling the audience to imagine a scene when xyzzy occurred.

Short story: A short personal story or story about someone else can really grip people, but the key is to make it short and not drag on.

Statistic or surprising fact: A really good statistic can get people thinking and challenge their perspective.

Aphorism: An aphorism is a common phrase or saying, such as “an apple a day keeps the doctor away.” Add a twist to the aphorism for added effect (“an apple a day keeps the doctor away... except if you're sitting with an apple computer for 8 hours a day.”)

Analogy or metaphor: Saying an analogy (“User interface is like peeling an onion”) can really break down complex terms into more simpler ones, making it more digestible for your audience.

Question: Starting with an engaging question can add a great amount of audience engagement, or even asking a rhetorical question can get them thinking out-of-the-box.

Quote: A great way to start your online presentation is with a quote—but it should be related to your presentation and from a credible source.

End With a Bang

The ending is the part where your audience is (hopefully) happy that the presentation is over, and they feel like they've learned something or feel inspired to change. If you've made it this far in your presentation, the LAST thing you want to do is crash and burn. So here are some tips to make an amazing presentation that will remain in your audience's mind long after it has ended.

Have an easy solution: The last few slides of your presentation should not be too information-heavy. Keep that for the middle. Your last slides should be both convincing and easy-to-understand.

Have a clear ending: Avoid the awkward “So, does anyone have any questions?” moment by providing an end slide to your virtual presentation. It can be a simple recap of the presentation, or a call to action.

Include a digital goodie: Include a digital goodie at the end! Everybody loves getting things, and it shouldn't stop just because you are online. Digital goodies might include a downloadable PDF or document that includes more statistics/research or a list of relevant sources related to your presentation.

Lead with a call to action: Calls to action are driven by emotion. And they work because we often respond to emotion over logic. If your business is proposing a new solution to an existing problem, try focusing on the emotional benefits vs. the statistics—happier customers vs. less product returns, cleaner world vs. smaller carbon footprint, etc. You can also try this double method: start with the negative, which amplifies the potential bad that might happen if your recommendation is not taken. Then, you can add in the positive, which highlights the good that can happen when your recommendation is taken.

End with humor: One of the best ways to end a presentation is to use humor. If you do it right, you can leave a HUGE impression on your audience that will last for days, weeks, or months! There are a few ways to end with humor. First, you can introduce a question in the beginning or middle of your presentation and answer it in a funny, surprising way at the end. Second, you can end a story you started but stopped in the beginning or middle of the presentation. Some really good people to draw inspiration from are stand-up comedians. One great example of callback humor is in the movie, Airplane! In the beginning of a movie, a passenger enters a taxi. The driver tells the passenger to wait for a bit, but the driver never comes back as he ends up on an airplane instead. In the closing credits, this scene is played, which recalls the intro of the movie in a funny but memorable way:

Practicing a Presentation

Did you know that the more you practice a presentation, the more you will sound as though you are presenting spontaneously? It takes great practice to pull off a flawless, professional presentation. In this lesson, you will learn the importance of practicing a presentation.

Let's examine a common business scenario for presentation development. Jessica works as a marketing manager of a candy company and has been assigned to present product research information to the marketing and sales team.

Importance of Practicing

There are many reasons to embrace practicing as part of a presentation repertoire. Practicing helps eliminate speaking flaws, such as tongue twisters, poorly worded sentences, or difficult-to-pronounce words. For example, if Jessica's candy presentation contains the tongue twister 'World Wide Web,' it would help if she would practice saying the phrase so that it flows off her tongue.

In addition, if her new candy flavor is espresso-flavored, she should pronounce it 'espresso' and not 'expresso.'

Practicing sets good timing for the presentation delivery. For example, Jessica might assemble a presentation and estimate a time of 30 minutes based on the number of slides. Unfortunately, if Jessica doesn't actually run through the presentation, she could end up with a speech double the length.

Practicing reduces nervousness and gauges a speaker's energy level. Many presenters quickly realize that giving a speech without any practice creates instant nervousness and trepidation. If Jessica is able to practice and gain confidence, it will make her presentation engaging and professional.

Techniques for Practicing

There are different techniques available to presenters to choose how they want to practice their presentation. The first method is to recreate the presentation environment. This can be achieved by practicing the speech in the room where Jessica will be later speaking.

In addition, it is helpful to use props and practice moving around the room. Jessica would want to practice her visual cues by bringing examples of the new espresso candy, setting up her technology needs, and moving around the room while delivering her speech. It would also benefit Jessica to arrive an hour early to do a dry run through of her entire candy presentation. This will help her gain confidence and will work out any last minute issues.

Establishing a Comfortable Environment

While you won't always have control over the environment when you do a presentation, there may be ways you can modify the environment so that it is both comfortable for you and the audience members. The guidelines that follow are intended to help you become aware of environmental factors that can affect the delivery of your presentation.

- Make sure the lighting is adequate.
- Locate the temperature controls and regulate the temperature if necessary. If it is too warm or too cold, audience members will focus on their discomfort rather than on your presentation.
- Conduct a test of any audiovisual equipment to ensure it's in working order. Have a backup plan in place just in case — whatever can go wrong, will go wrong at the worst possible time.
- Clean off any white boards or chalk boards that might distract the audience.
- Make adjustments to the setup of the room to ensure everyone in the audience will be able to see you. Make sure that everyone can see the visuals you plan to use.

- If possible, practice your talk in the setting where you are scheduled to speak. This will not only help you determine what other factors you might have to overcome, but also make you feel more comfortable. If practicing in the room isn't possible, try to visit it prior to your presentation so you know what to expect.
- When possible, greet members of the audience as they come into the room. Not only will this make them feel welcome and at ease, but it may also help reduce your nervousness.
- Try to eliminate barriers between you and the audience. These kinds of barriers include lecterns, tables, or audiovisual equipment. Physical barriers communicate that you're trying to maintain your distance from the audience.

REFINING YOUR PRESENTATION SKILLS

- Identifying the need.
- Decide on Formal.
- Formulate Your Objectives.
 - Productivity Objective
 - Performance objectives
 - Ability/Skill objectives
 - Knowledge objectives
 - Receptivity objectives
- Understand the Audience

NEGOTIATION

Introduction

1. Negotiations is the process by which two parties with different goals try to reach all agreement on the best course of time.
2. Business negotiations may be between buyer or seller.
3. Negotiations between employees' union and management.

Negotiation Skills

- Negotiation is a process of bargaining in which two parties, each of whom have something that the others wants, try to reach an agreement, on mutually accepted terms.

Definition:

- The discussion and bargaining that goes on between parties before a contract is settled or a deal is definitely agreed upon.
- The process of trying to reach an agreement through discussion.

- A meeting where this discussion takes places.

Definition

Negotiation is any form of meeting or discussion in which you or the persons your are in contact with use argument and persuasion to achieve an agreed decision or action.

- Alan Fowler

Nature & Need of Negotiation

- Negotiation takes place between two parties. Both the parties are equally interested in an agreed action/result .
- Negotiation reaches agreement through discussion, not instruction, orders or power/influence/authority.
- Negotiation is a form of communication where the objective is agreement .

Need of Negotiation

- Issues involving more than one person.
- Having different views.
- Both parties willing to meet & discuss to reach agreed decision.

Factors requires Negotiation*

1. Place:

The place of meeting for negotiations influences the level of confidence choosing a place.

2. Time

3. Subjective factor

4. Persuasion

2. Time

The choice of time holding discussions should be fixed according to mutual convince.

Different stages of negotiation

- Exchanging initial views
- Exploring possible compromise
- Searching for common ground
- Securing agreement

3. Subjective factors:

- Personal relationship
- Fear
- Future considerations
- Mutual obligation
- Practical wisdom
- Categories of influence:

4.Categories of influence

- Status difference
- Higher connections with sources of power
- Expectations about outcomes
- Information & expertise
- Reputation of the other person
- Aiming
- Location of the negotiation environment
- Formality
- Work pressure
- Personal likes & dislikes
- Mutual obligations
- Concern for working relationships

5.Persuasive

It's a mixture of attitude, psychology, language, tone & body language.

Different persuasive skills:

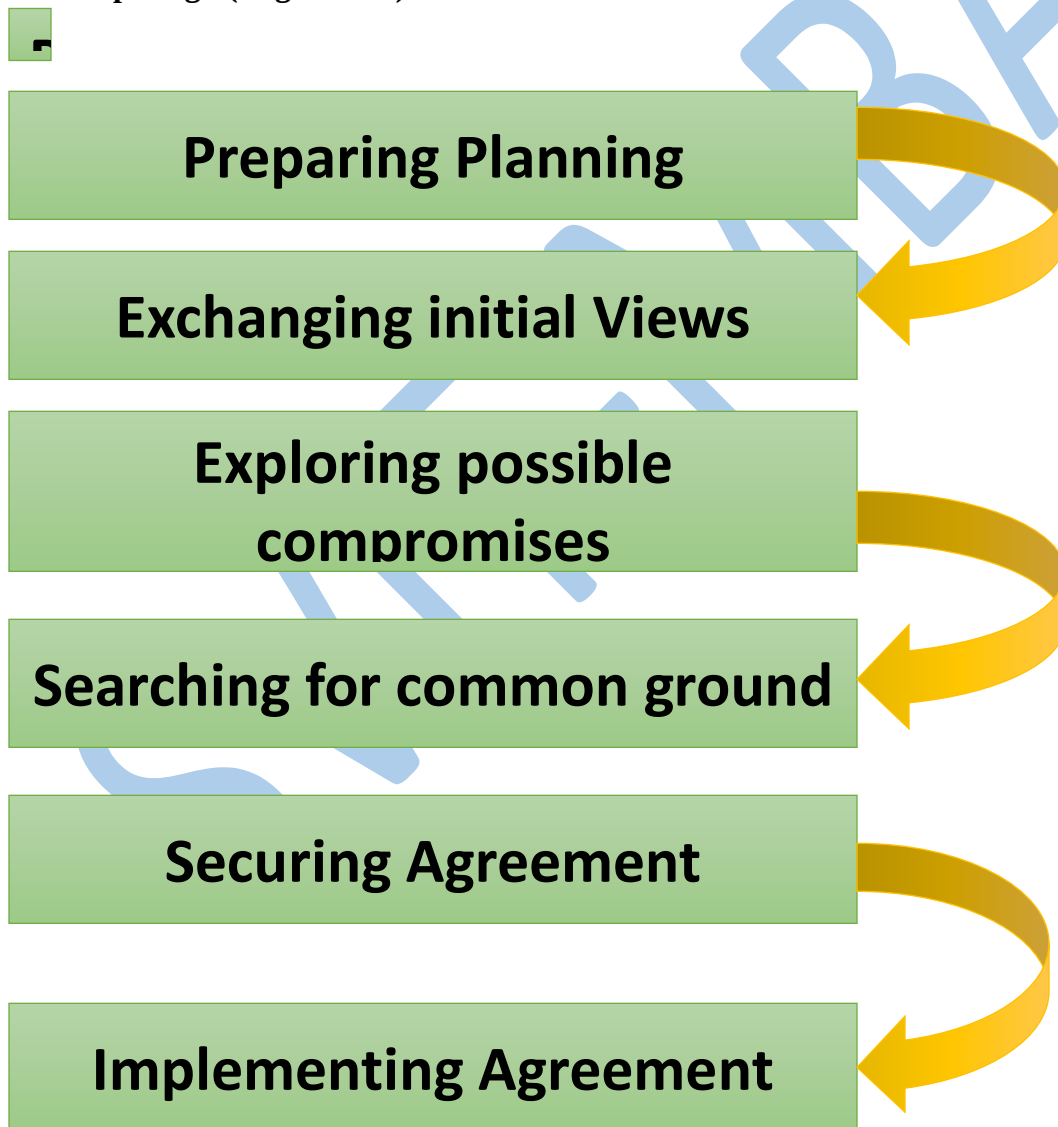

- Style
- Attitude
- Talking & listening
- Probing & questioning
- Using breaks when necessary
- Body language concessions & compromise
- Summarizing
- Reaching an agreement

Preparing for Negotiation

- Know yourself
- Determine the three positions

- Know your BATNA(Best Alternative to a Negotiated Agreement)
- Gather information
- Know the other party's needs
- Be prepared to move beyond positions
- Give & take
- Sharpen your ability to keep silent & listen quietly
- Develop your skills of asking questions
- Be aware of your body language

Six-Step/Stages(Negotiation)Process-AlanFowler

Negotiation Strategies*

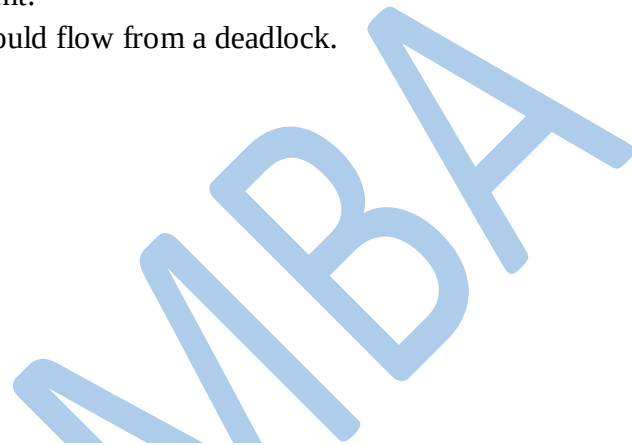

1. Initial Strategies:
2. During Discussion
3. Reaching an Agreement
4. Summarising

In case of Deadlock

1. If there is no final agreement even after a prolonged discussion the strategy should be.
2. Use the ethical aspect of agreement.
3. Explain the consequences that would flow from a deadlock.
4. Remain positive.

Negotiating Skills

- Willingness to endure
- Reading for information
- Speak with conviction
- Composure
- perseverance

Etiquette: Meaning, Types, Benefits and Basic Rules

Etiquette is defined as formal rules and manners that are considered sacred and acceptable in society. These have been established by convention for a very long time and are followed diligently in both professional and social settings.

If you are looking for an answer to what is etiquette, then let me tell you that it refers to the guiding principle that dictates what our behavior and manners should be in society. It proves an asset because it tells you in explicit terms about what it considers to be logical and rational. It is the etiquette that draws a different line between people with good manners and people who behave irresponsibly everywhere.

Etiquette and manners go hand in hand. You will also find several etiquette books like etiquette for a lady, etiquette for kids, list of manners and etiquette, the importance of etiquette, and etiquette rules to help you in your task of learning things related to it.

Types of etiquette

1. Social etiquette

One of the most important etiquettes is social etiquette as it informs an individual about the norms and behavior that society considers acceptable

2. Meeting etiquette

This type of etiquette informs individuals about the styles one should give preference to while attending meetings, seminars, and events.

3. Wedding etiquette

Yes, there are wedding etiquettes in place that inform individuals that one should not be late, should behave sensibly, and do not drink too much at weddings.

4. Corporate etiquette

This type of etiquette informs individuals about how an individual should behave at his workplace and maintain dignity.

5. Bathroom etiquette

This type of etiquette refers to the rules that an individual should follow if he is using public or office toilets.

6. Business etiquette

This type of etiquette acts as a guiding force to the professionals and helps them in conducting business deals in an ethical and effective manner

5. Eating etiquette

This type of etiquette informs individuals about the rules and regulations regarding their eating habits.

Do not speak when the mouth is full, thank the person serving your food, do not leave the table until everyone has finished eating, etc. are some important eating etiquettes

6. Telephone etiquette

This type of etiquette informs individuals about how they should behave on the telephone. How to interact with others, not putting someone on hold for a long time, greeting the other person, and keeping your tone and pitch at the perfect level are basic telephone etiquettes one should always follow.

Advantages / Benefits of using the correct etiquette

1. It is proper etiquette that helps to create the first impression on others. The first few seconds when you are waiting to be introduced, and your smile is cordial and warm, and later when your handshake is firm are basic etiquette and manners that can have a positive impact on others
2. Following proper business etiquettes in your professional life will enhance your status at the workplace. People will consider you more capable, intelligent, and professional than the others
3. The benefit of etiquette is that it can boost self-confidence and self-esteem
4. Etiquette helps in making people around you comfortable. This proves beneficial as it helps in creating strong relationships and friendship
5. It is the etiquette that urges you to be kind to others. This boosts your satisfaction level as well as happiness
6. People who are well mannered and follow proper etiquette rules often stand out even in the crowd. Their solid foundation provides more opportunities for growth compared to people who are lagging in social etiquettes
7. Using proper etiquette ensures a clear and better level of communication between people as it breaks unnecessary barriers that are standing in the way of open communication
8. Following proper rules of social etiquette in any given situation provides a sense of personal security
9. Basic etiquettes give us a fair idea about how a culture functions. If you are traveling to new places, it will prove beneficial as basic rules are generally the same in almost all the places
10. Etiquettes help the children to learn about rules and regulations from an early age. This proves beneficial when they go to school, college and even when they enter the professional world
11. Better etiquettes result in positive attention from others
